The application is based on westernized Feng Shui, providing a bagua map, along with easy to use and follow instructions for optimizing the energy in a person's home or office. Users can overlay onto the bagua map existing pictures from their phone's photo library or snap a new one of their room or floor plan.

Nashville, TN - Announcing that Tisha Morris, the developer of Feng Shui Bagua Map, has released a program for users interested in an easier way to improve the flow of their lives. The application is based on westernized Feng Shui, providing a bagua map, along with easy to use and follow instructions for optimizing the energy in a person's home or office.

The app was created by author, life coach and interior designer, Tisha Morris. "As a Feng Shui consultant and iPhone lover, I noticed that there were no good Feng Shui apps available. So, I decided to create my own," explains Morris. In designing the app, she had a few criteria that had to be met, "It had to be simple, functional and informational enough for anyone to use."

Ease of use is one of the major attractions for users. The art of feng shui is ancient and can involve compasses and very complicated instructions. Morris adapted the more popular and widely used westernized method for creating the Feng Shui Bagua Map, so people with little or no knowledge of feng shui can still achieve the effects of clearing and improving the energy in their living and work spaces.

Naturally, the application comes equipped with a bagua map. Users can overlay onto that map, existing pictures from their phone's photo library or snap a new one of their room or floor plan. As it is the westernized method being used, the bagua map lines up with the main door of a room or building, depending on what is being worked on.

Once the photo is in place, a user can instantly see the nine sections of their home or office. Each of those nine squares represents a different life aspect. Users can address their areas of wealth, love and relationships, career, family and creativity, travel and helpful people, health, fame and reputation, self knowledge. These areas surround the all important centre, which influences the rest of the areas.

To find out how to optimize, balance and harmonize a particular space, a user merely has to tap on the square that corresponds with the area they want to enhance. All the necessary instruction is revealed so that a user can begin immediately.

Morris has ensured a smooth, painless experience by including some important features and functions in her application, like allowing users to save and create as many feng shui maps as they want and by providing in-depth information about each sector of the map. It's like having a coach present to explain and guide users through the feng shui process for each area of life.

- * Based on westernized feng shui methods
