Renton, Washington - Hooked In Motion has teamed up with Occipital, the creators of Red Laser, the #1 selling app on the iPhone/iPod App Store, to release iCollect Video Games, available for free on the iTunes App Store starting today. Utilizing UPC barcode scanning technology from Occipital, iCollect Video Games allows gamers to scan in their games using the barcode on the back of the case and obtain detailed information about each game. iCollect Video Games also features a detailed search feature, as well as wishlist and preorder features.

iCollect Video Games, a free iPhone/iPod/iPad application, supports barcodes worldwide from console systems like Nintendo Wii, Nintendo DS, Playstation 3, Xbox 360, PSP, and more. Simply by scanning in a game they own or a game at a store, users can see details like never before. Each game record contains more information than most any other source, and includes details such as publisher, personal high score tracking, IGN rating, and pictures of the actual case that the UPC barcode belongs to. With the simple touch of a button, users can add the game to their collection and manage it from within the app.

The application features a number of unique features beyond just barcode scanning. Using the wishlist and preorder features, users can keep track of which games to buy in the future quickly and easily. They'll also be able to easily switch between game types on their main catalog screen. Searching is in depth and allows users to see all games that they own made by a specific publisher, or all games they've never beaten, for example.
