Munich, Germany - Announcing that Robin Reiter, the developer of DreamMachine HD, has released the latest update for iPhone, iPod touch and iPad users who want to control their dreams and get a much better night's sleep. DreamMachine enables users to select and customize their dreams and be awakened at the perfect time, using the built-in sleep cycle clock. The 2.0 version update means easier setup for users, as the app no longer requires calibration. Developers have also increased the accuracy of sleep readings when the application creates sleep profiles.

DreamMachine HD is the answer for anyone who suffers from nightmares, doesn't seem able to dream, or for those who have sleep problems.

This app literally allows users to control their dream state. Users simply select and optionally customize their favorite dream, set the alarm then place the device on their bed. DreamMachine accesses a device's sensitive accelerometer to create sleep profiles and detailed SleepGraphs. Even slight movement during the night is picked up by the program.

From the information gleaned by a user's nightly sleep patterns, DreamMachine calculates the perfect time to initiate dream recordings, which are picked up by the subconscious. This is the part that eliminates nightmares or stimulates the return of dreaming. Users are able to have a full night's rest, thanks to the controlling of their dreams, along with the sleep cycle alarm clock, which plays a user's chose of sounds to awaken them at their time of lightest sleep.

The result is all that matters to people who are sleep-deprived and DreamMachine HD delivers help for users to finally get a good night's sleep and wake up feeling good.

In the 2.0 version update of the application, developers have made things better and easier. Users will no longer have to calibrate the app before running it, and readings for sleep profiles picked up by DreamMachine HD are even more accurate than before, further enhancing user experience.
